

ARTSY

17 Shows You Need to See during Frieze Week in London

by Scott Indrisek
October 1, 2018

This week sees the opening of the 2018 edition of Frieze London and Frieze Masters, but there's a wide array of art to be seen outside of Regent's Park. Those looking for edgy, alternative fairs might head to the Anti Art Fair; anyone who appreciates art in uncommon, grand places can check out Yinka Shonibare's temporary installation at the Fitzrovia Chapel, or David Hockney's new stained glass window at Westminster Abbey. But London's galleries and museums are also bringing their A-game, and it's worth carving out time on your calendar to take in some of the 17 exhibitions we've spotlighted below.

Lucy Dodd at Sprüth Magers

Installation view of Lucy Dodd, "Miss Mars," Sprüth Magers. Courtesy of Sprüth Magers. Photo by Stephen White.

New York-based artist Lucy Dodd gets her U.K. solo debut, presenting furniture and new abstract paintings at Sprüth Magers. A rundown of the materials she works with can read like a Whole Foods shopping list; a representative 2016 painting involves yerba mate, wild black walnut rind, and kombucha SCOBY. The result is earthy, mystical compositions that are arrayed throughout exhibition spaces in unconventional ways. For this show, entitled "Miss Mars," Dodd incorporates a wide array of challenging pigments—from cinnabar to her own child's excrement.